

ProQuest Dissertations & Theses Global and the University of Bristol

For librarians and researchers at the University of Bristol,

“tracking down theses and dissertations and then obtaining them, particularly from overseas, can often be a time-consuming and involved process,” as faculty librarian James Webley explains.

To turn a time-consuming process into an easy, fast way to obtain information, the University chose ProQuest Dissertations & Theses Global (PQDT). The largest single repository of full-text dissertations and theses offers scholars more than 4.5 million graduate works from around the world, covering every academic discipline.

James Webley sees PQDT as a resource that “opens up a rich repository of key resources for our graduate students,” and anticipates student work “that is better researched and builds upon what’s gone before without duplicating.” The University’s head of research engagement says PQDT “will enhance research services for our users.”

Visit proquest.com/go/dissertations

Why ProQuest Dissertations & Theses?

Dissertations and theses are essential to scholarship throughout the university. Working with ProQuest, institutions can transform the library’s dissertations and theses, make institutional research globally discoverable from trusted databases, and provide on-demand use to authoritative information.

- Dissertations are a crucial form of scholarly communication.
- Dissertations provide great sources for specific areas of research.
- Dissertations are scholarly works based on original research.
- Dissertations test and present new ideas and trends.
- Dissertations contain data and results of lab experiments, fieldwork, surveys, and statistics that are often the basis of journal articles—details journal articles often don’t include.
- Dissertations provide valuable context for learning about faculty, institutions, and fellow scholars.

proquest.com